

Any technology which can so seriously disrupt amateur radio communicatioons, should not be considered. Amateur radio has proven repeatedly to be invaluable in times of crisis, and to place it it in jeopardy is senseless, particularly in view of the fact that alternative technolgies exist (even within the BPL framework, such as operating in the microwave region with point-to-point concentrators channelling the signals) which do not cause interference.